During the Second World War millions of men left their homes and families to fight for their country. Meanwhile, those waving a tearful goodbye had to carry on. They dug their allotments, measured out their bath water, and presented their ration coupons for food and clothing. Through bombings and blackouts, the people of Britain did whatever they could to aid the war effort. In this detailed and well researched book, we learn what life was really like on the Home Front during the Second World War. Megan Westley enhances her account with her own experiences of 'living on the Home Front'. Over the last year, she has thrown herself into wartime cooking and rationing, espoused the mottos 'Dig for Victory' and 'make do and mend', sacrificed television, and even recreated an air raid. As well as providing a readable, intimate picture of day-to-day life during the era, Living on the Home Front is full of authentic wartime recipes for the reader to try, and tips on everything from growing your own vegetables to mending clothes

Something to think about

By Robert W. Gregory

Living On The Home Front could be considered an experimental living history experience. The author, Megan Westley decided to try and live her daily life as Britons did during the second world war. She divided the year into six two month blocks and would introduce new concepts into as they would have happened. For the British this was a total war and the government had a hand in every aspect of life. She had to struggle not only with rationing, but trying to make do with period recipes and what was available. Read the book to find out how it changed how she now views things and then think to yourself about what you might do to change your life.

A Helpful Account of Wartime Britain, Particularly Rationing

By Andrea Broomfield

Megan Westley's book is absorbing and more importantly, it is one of the most lucid breakdowns of the complicated system of British WWII rationing that I have seen. Because Westley wished to "live" the war on the home front, she had to become an expert in navigating not only between ration coupons and ration points, but also the constant shift of how much food per weight or volume was available--or not available--at any given time.

Anyone familiar with the wonderful _The 1940s House_ (Wall to Wall, Channel 4 television production) will likely enjoy Westley's book also, in that she subjects herself, to the degree possible, to the same wartime life that this reality TV family experienced. I appreciated Westley's honesty about her degree of success in trying to live a WWII life in 21st-century Britain, especially when she found her days too boring to write about, or when she had to take a break from the tedium just to come back to it with more commitment. At times, however, her experiment seemed so insubstantial in light of what was actually occurring in wartime Britain. She acknowledges this, however.

Finally, what I found most helpful was the clear year-by-year timeline of how the war started, progressed, and concluded. While Westley does not try to write a scholarly monograph, I would recommend this book to any historian, particularly a food historian, as a preliminary read and reference source before delving into more detailed scholarship on this fascinating part of British history.
