Violet Harris, a 27 year old, aristocratic Englishwoman, arrives in Shanghai in the spring of 1922. She is to marry Robert Preston, a wealthy trader and heir to the Earl of Wilford. But when Violet inadvertently incurs the wrath of a brutal Chinese warlord, she is snapped up off the streets of Shanghai and finds herself his prisoner on the way to an uncertain future at his fortress deep in the heart of China. Once there, Violet can't decide between submission and rebellion. And where is Robert? Will he save her?

You may take everything but you can't take my heart

By Curlygirl

This is a harrowing tale of slavery, abuse and degradation. This is a review of the first three books and while the story of Violet's plight into slavery was difficult to get through, I was pulled in to the story, it had me thinking about survival and whether I could withstand the life thrust upon Violet. Can someone be forced to give up everything and survive? This was a thought provoking tale of one man's (Wang) attempt to bend the will of a strong woman and would stop at nothing to own her mind, body and (soul)Heart. Violet is forced to give up her body and mind but refuses to give up her heart. Wang's fascination with Violet grows from book one through book three and while he is a cruel and heartless man, we begin to see that deep down he may be capable of love. It is hard to tell where Paul Blades will take us in the next book but I am hoping violet will lead Wang out of his darkness and into the light.

It was well written, engaging and hard to put down. I did come across a dozen grammatical errors and some of the content I had to skim through because I did not want to have to go through the cruelty again and again. I do not condone this type of treatment of women but it did leave me pondering some philosophical questions about trust, power and the ability of giving up of oneself completely to another human being.
